

Development, Change, Dysfunction and Mitigation

Overview

Business ventures, economic development, and other activities initiated by outsiders often transform the lives of communities and individuals. The resulting changes can create stress that leads to dysfunction requiring the intervention of social workers, therapists, and human services providers. A 5 day course provides a background regarding anticipating and mitigating these hurtful ramifications. Designed for both business/development specialists and members of social work/human services professions, a valuable orientation is provided to those who plan, facilitate, and respond to social and economic change.

The primary objectives of the course are as follows:

- To develop an understanding of how business and/or social development can trigger change.
- To develop an understanding of how change can trigger dysfunction.
- To create an awareness of strategies for anticipating and mitigating stress and dysfunction.
- To create an ability to conceptualizing a variety of circumstances in which dysfunction occurs.
- To help develop ability in understanding the role of therapy/social work in mitigating dysfunction.
- Envisioning political solution to potential dysfunction
